

ENJOY NATURE'S NATURAL GIFT!

FURS ARE A RENEWABLE NATURAL RESOURCE AND NON-POLLUTING. THEY DO NOT OVERBURDEN AND DESTROY THE ENVIRONMENT.

The fur industry has a vital interest and has led the way in keeping worldwide animal populations strong and healthy.

In the U.S. it is legally impossible to buy a fur garment made from an endangered species. Law forbids traffic in the fur of any registered endangered species.

In a world where people-the most numerous animals on earth-interact with wildlife habitat in countless ways, management of animal populations will always be necessary for their survival.

Trapping is an important wildlife management tool that is recognized, accepted, endorsed, and regulated by the government.

Nature's way of controlling overpopulation is starvation and disease. Animals rarely die of old age.

It is far crueler, more inhumane, and impractical to enforce the "let-Nature-take-its- course" policy.

Fur-farmed animals are among the world's best cared-for animals; from their vitamin-enriched feed to the prompt veterinary care they receive. The farmer's utmost concern is the growth of a healthy animal to produce a quality pelt. These animals also consume by-products that cannot be used for human consumption.

Fur-bearing animals such as mink are being used in medical research for finding cures for many deadly diseases including Sudden Infant Death Syndrome (Crib Death), Alzheimers, and AIDS.

Infact, virtually every aspect of life as we know it still depends heavily on the use of animals, some of the by-products of animals are used in the following: manufacturing of medicine, cosmetics, sun tan oil, hair products, car wax, shoe polish, photographic film, paints, brake fluid, tires, pet food, fertilizer, and more.

All synthetics-including fake furs-are composed of chemicals derived from oil. They are non-renewable resources which pollute our environment and are not biodegradable.

Throughout history, fur garments have been worn and enjoyed for their warmth, practicality, durability, and beauty. A fur garment can be remodeled and, with proper care, will last for many turns of the fashion wheel. We in the fur industry believe you should wear your fur garment with pride FURever.
